Beneath the stains of time

Taken in cities across Europe, North America, Asia, and Africa, Muholi's Thameur Mejri blurs the boundaries between public and private in an effort to confront individual and collective values, particularly in contemporary Tunisian society. For this purpose, he takes the human body as a tool to measure both possibilities and prohibitions, making it a central element of his artistic practice. Through his palette and complex compositions Thameur Mejri's works question the notions of humanism and the construction of human beings on a social scale, by representing several paradoxes that emerge from political and cultural practices. His precise and prolific iconography constitutes a device critical of our relationship with the objects and symbols that surround us in daily life and which impose, whether consciously or not, certain forms of alienation.
